For historical reasons, most easterners carry plate armour. But plate armour, while reliable, is expensive to build (contains many iron bars). The armour is quite unwieldy to wear. Does anyone know if an argument has ever been made that plate armour is impractical? A: I'm a military historian, so I'll try an answer a little outside of armour. Early 15th century European armor has three major aspects: the helmet, the coat of arm (shield and sword), and the headpiece. During that time (1410 to 1450) plate armor is virtually nonexistent. It wasn't until the late-15th century that metallurgy began to change, and smelting technology improved. After 1450, the most important developments were the elaboration and refinement of steel types. Refined steel allowed armor to be much thinner, and thus light and more flexible. Additionally, plates could be made stronger, making armor effectively bulletproof. Also, plates could be made thinner and layered, which became a relatively-popular addition to armor. However, plate armor was, and still is, very expensive to produce. This is because of two factors. First, steel was a smelting based manufacturing process that requires massive furnaces and a great deal of heat to make. Second, it required a wide variety of different metals to be used in armor. With the advent of gunpowder weapons, a gunpowder-based manufacturing process became increasingly popular, which could make a variety of steel types at a much lower cost. This ended the era of plate armor. Until then, it was simply the most practical armor to use, but not everyone could afford it. To address your question about people thinking armor is impractical: it's not universal. In fact, it's the opposite. Some medieval soldiers preferred not to wear armor. Of course, most felt the need to wear a helmet and coat of armor to protect themselves from the heat. Finally, a note
